

Ingrid Cranfield

I have been associated with EPC since I first heard about it 10 years ago when I was an Enfield Councillor, and I became a Trustee a few years after that. I have been connected with education in its broadest sense most of my working life, being a trained teacher and involved with organisations that challenge and assist young people in a holistic way. Professionally, I am a writer, editor, translator and administrator. I like being a Trustee of EPC because I am much exercised by the obvious need for EPC's interventions and greatly impressed by the work that the charity does to meet that need. It is rewarding to be part of the effort to steer the organisation in the right direction. I also like and admire the people involved, enjoy their company and have pleasure in working with them towards the same ends.
