

Jane Hessami

After a long career in inclusive education as a teacher and inclusion manager, I was keen to remain involved in meaningful work following retirement. Through friends and professional connections, I was introduced to EPC and invited to join the Board of Trustees three years ago.

I am proud to support the ethos of EPC, which is committed to developing clubs and activities that build skills and resilience in children and families with additional needs, helping to promote equality of opportunity for all. While securing resources for charities remains a significant challenge, the Board of Trustees works collectively to address these pressures and to strengthen EPC's vital services within local schools and the wider community.
